In recent years archaeological investigations on a suite of Paleoindian sites in Northern New Hampshire have brought to light new and significant data regarding Paleoindian adaptations to the extreme climate at the end of the Pleistocene. Avocational and professional archaeologists from across the region have participated in this long-term research through the New Hampshire State Conservation and Rescue Archaeology Program (SCRAP). The presentation will highlight the efforts of these volunteers and the contributions they have made to our understanding of this pioneer period.
